By Sherrilyn Roush and Glenn McGee

Face transplants are a relatively new medical procedure, with the first successful transplant being performed in 2005. Since then, over 40 face transplants have been performed around the world. The procedure is typically used to treat patients who have suffered severe facial injuries, such as burns or gunshot wounds. Face transplants can also be used to treat patients with congenital facial deformities.

The ethics of face transplants are complex and controversial. Some people argue that face transplants are a violation of human rights, while others argue that they are a necessary medical procedure that can save lives and improve the quality of life for patients. In their book, Face Transplants: The Ethics of the Other, philosophers Sherrilyn Roush and Glenn McGee explore the ethical issues surrounding face transplants. They argue that face transplants are a form of "radical alterity," which means that they challenge our traditional notions of identity and personhood. They also argue that face transplants raise important questions about the nature of consent, autonomy, and vulnerability.

Roush and McGee's book is a valuable contribution to the literature on face transplants. It is a thoughtful and nuanced exploration of the ethical issues surrounding this complex and controversial procedure.
